TO THE CLASS

At the time of issuing the twenty-fifth anniversary report of the Class in June, 1909, it was not contemplated that another report of the volume of the present one would be issued within so short a space of time as ten years.

The recent ending of the European war seemed to suggest this as an opportune time for recording, while interest was still vivid, the various activities of members in connection with the war.

Many of these are now shown by our records to have been of distinct importance and value, accomplished in one instance, that of Plummer, at the cost of life itself.

It seemed appropriate to mention briefly the war activities of the children of members in so far as they were performed with military, naval or allied organizations, on the ground that such chronicle would be of interest to the members in general as well as to the parents themselves.

The membership of the Class comprises one hundred and eighty-two now living,—one hundred and sixty-three regular, thirteen temporary, and six associate members.

Since the eighth report was published in 1914, eleven members have died,—ten regular and one temporary.

Comparatively few members have failed to respond to the requests for information, so that the report forms quite a complete record to date.

THOMAS K. CUMMINS,
Secretary.

Records of the Class

been a member of the Massachusetts Commission for the Blind continuously since 1909. He was Chairman of the American-Canadian Committee under the American Red Cross to recommend a programme of service for those blinded in the Halifax explosion of December 6, 1917; was a member of the Advisory Committee on Government Care of the War-Blinded.

He writes: "In my 1909 sketch I told of having rebuilt one old institution in Philadelphia and then of having come back to Boston in order to rebuild another, the venerable Perkins Institution. Since then, after travel and study, I prepared the owners' requirements for a million-dollar plant, consisting of service building, school houses, and fourteen dwellings on the cottage family plan, all which was erected in 1912-13 on a thirty-four-acre estate at Watertown. This Massachusetts School for the Blind is an endowed institution for 300 pupils and some 120 teachers, officers and other helpers, and is today not only very attractive but the most complete of its kind anywhere.

"How little some of us know while in college what our life-work is to be! I, for example, had there steered my course towards medicine, but paternal inheritance has made me a teacher and circumstance a rebuilder of institutions. However, inasmuch as vocation has traveled with inclination, I have been wholly satisfied. Nothing I ever studied at college has been wasted; in fact, my small scientific and medical knowledge has been a help. As a result, therefore, of my experience and observation, I am now influencing my son to elect such undergraduate courses as are inspirationally taught or as will give him a broad foundation and culture."

His son, Edward Ellis, Jr., Harvard, 1921, spent six months in Italy in 1918 as an ambulance driver for the American Red Cross. He received the Italian War Cross for distinguished service.

Occupation	Public Service Corporation.
Address	Electric and Gas Building, Atlanta, Ga.

He is Chairman of the Board of Directors of the Georgia Railway and Power Company. He writes: "The business of the Company of which I am the head changed from that of a 'public utility' to a 'war utility' as soon as the United States entered the war. Our services became more and more necessary to the Government in successfully prosecuting the war and we centered our efforts on making the Company and its services useful in this way to the highest degree."

His son, Henry Morrell, Jr., was commissioned Provisional Second Lieutenant, attached to the 30th Infantry, U.S.A. On December 1, 1917, he was transferred to and commissioned in the Coast Artillery; he was assigned to the 71st Artillery, C.A.C., leaving in July, 1918, for overseas service. He is Professor of German in Harvard College.

He writes: "I was at my old home in Germany when the war broke out, and I felt convinced from the first that this was not a defensive, but an offensive war on the part of the Imperial German Government, who had succeeded in duping the people. A thousand times they had been warned by some of their best and wisest men that Germany was pursuing a wrong and dangerous policy. Of such warnings there is abundant evidence in many a prominent German weekly or monthly journal published during the eighties, the nineties, and the first decade of this century; but the majority of the people did not listen and were finally misled into the belief that they were corralled by their enemies on all sides. It is a satisfaction to me now, though a very sad one, that I also tried in those earlier days to caution my German brethren, for my twenty-four visits to the Fatherland, between 1879 and 1914, — one of which extended over nearly three years, and another over fourteen months, — enabled me to make some of them see themselves as we Americans saw them from here. A few of the observations which I made during those visits are recorded in letters published by the New York Nation, as follows: 'Emperor William's Birthday,' February 21, 1889; 'The Enemies of Democracy in Germany,' July 24, 1890; and 'Corralling the Germans,' October 1, 1908.

"On returning from my last visit to Germany, late in September, 1914, I found myself out of touch, of course, with most of my fellow German-Americans. Between that time and September, 1918, I repeatedly expressed my supposedly traitorous, anti-imperialistic views in German verses, which I managed to get published in the New Yorker Volkszeitung (a socialistic paper) of January 10, 1915, January 9, 1916, August 13, 1916, and February 17, 1918.

"On September 15, 1917, I joined with about twenty or twenty-five other German-Americans, some of whom were descendants of revolutionists of 1848, in a meeting at New York in order to organize what has since become known as the Society of American Friends of German Democracy. At first we met with a good deal of opposition and ridicule, but now the association counts its members by the thousands and even tens of thousands.

"In September, 1918, I was asked by Mr. Creel's Publicity Committee to write an article setting forth my personal views and attitude during the war, the intention being to have this and other contributions of the same kind distributed among the people in Germany.

"During the anxious days and weeks of April, 1918, when the Germans were making their last drive, I perpetrated the following English verses, which may never get into print, but which I am nevertheless willing to record here, because they express something of the mingled feelings of pride and humiliation; of happiness and sadness which a man experiences who has two great countries to love and to serve, and who finds that he can unite the love and the service of both only by following the beacon light of liberty:

MY WAR AND PEACE PRAYER

April, 1918

Let me not die, O Lord, till I see flying
My chosen banner, raised anew,
To welcome home the brave who feared not dying,
The brave who tyrants overthrew —
My banner: red — white — blue.

Let me not die, O Lord, till I see waving
From German huts and castles old
The banner which my fathers raised when braving
The tyrant's host, too strong to hold —
Their banner: black — red — gold.¹

Then let me die, O Lord, as both I am swinging,
The red — white — blue, the black — red — gold;
And as the bells from shore to shore are ringing:
'Freedom alone can Peace uphold!'
Let Thy love all enfold."

He writes: "Special Representative, Pennsylvania Railroad Company, Washington, D. C. October, 1911, was promoted to Eastern Superintendent, Star Union Line. September 10, 1917, was transferred to Washington, D. C., to represent the Company before the various government commissions that were established during the war. April, 1918, was made member of Committee on Freight Control by Director-General of Railroads. This was purely war work and gave us control of all supplies for the army overseas, including both material and ammunition, which originated in the South and passed north through the three Virginia Gateways, viz.: Hagerstown, Md., Alexandria, Va., and Norfolk, Va. This was most interesting work and lasted until December 1, 1918, when the Committee was released from duty with the thanks of the Director-General. I was then made Special Repre-

Occupation	Lawyer.
Address	1000 Metropolitan Life Building, Minneapolis, Minn.

He is a member of the firm of Brown and Guesmer. For the past ten years he has been lecturer on the "Law of Water Rights" in the Law Schools of the University of Minnesota and of the University of North Dakota, and also in the Minnesota College of Law. He has been Chairman of the Minnesota State Board Commissioners Uniform Laws since 1911, and Chairman of the American Bar Association Committee to Oppose Judicial Recall and Allied Measures since 1912. He was Vice-President of the National Conference Commissioners Uniform State Laws, 1913-1914.

He writes: "While I have been continuously practicing law, I have had to take up a great many business matters and have many responsible business positions, including the following: President, Manistique Pulp & Paper Co., Manistique, Mich.; Vice-President, Manistique Light & Power Co., Manistique, Mich.; Vice-President, Minnesota Tribune Co., publisher of the Minneapolis Tribune, Minneapolis, Minn.; Member of the Associated Press for the Minneapolis Evening Tribune; President, F. E. Murphy Co., Minneapolis, Minn.; President, Red River Farm and Land Co., Crookston, Minn.; Director of all above companies and also following companies: Crookston Water Works, Power & Light Co., Crookston, Minn.; The Electrical Development Co., Crookston, Minn.; W. J. Murphy Co., Minneapolis, Minn.

"I am General Counsel for all the above companies and of course many other companies, but my main professional work in the past few years has been in connection with the above-named companies. I have been in entire charge of the Manistique Pulp and Paper Company for nearly a year, and I have had sole charge of the construction of pulp and paper mills which cost two million dollars and have just commenced to operate, beside other investments in connection with the same companies."

At the annual meeting of the Harvard Club of Minnesota in February, 1919, at which Brown presided, Ex-President Taft, in the course of his remarks, said: "Through the efforts of Rome G. Brown the falsity of the doctrine of recall of judicial decisions was exposed. The country owes him a debt of gratitude for his labors in that connection."

His son, Edwin Chandler, served as Assistant Attorney in the United States Food Administration, Division of Enforcement, Washington, D. C. At the time of the signing of the armistice he was serving as First Lieutenant in the Army Service Corps, Camp Upton, Long Island, N. Y.

His daughter, Dorothy H., served as Assistant in the American Red Cross Home Service Division, Minneapolis.

Born	February 10, 1861, South Boston, Mass.
Parents	Howard and Abigail Frances (Rogers) Clapp.
School	English High School and Boston Latin School, Boston, Mass.
Degrees	A.B.; LL.B. and A.M. Harvard, 1887.
Married	October 6, 1892, Gertrude Blanchard of Dorchester, Mass.
Children	Howard Rogers, July 24, 1893, A.B. Harvard, 1916 (died November 3, 1918); Emily Blanchard, October 27, 1894; Elizabeth Brewer, January 21, 1900.
Occupation	Lawyer.
Address	60 State Street, Boston, Mass.

He is still practicing law as a member of the firm of Ropes, Gray, Boyden and Perkins in Boston.

He writes: "My son, Howard Rogers, graduated from Harvard in the Class of 1916, and entered the Harvard Law School that fall. In February, 1917, he joined the Harvard Regiment. In May he went to Plattsburg. In July he was transferred at his request to the Aviation Service. He graduated 'with honor' from the ground school at the Institute of Technology in September and then went to Mineola for training in actual flying. He received his commission as First Lieutenant in December. About January 30, 1918, he went overseas. He was at Issoudun and Orley, France, and Furbara, Italy. In August he was assigned to the 22nd U. S. Aëro Squadron, and throughout September and October he was in active service at the front along the Meuse and in the region of the Argonne. On the afternoon of November 3 he was one of a patrol of six who went over the lines in the direction of Sedan. Somewhere to the north of Beaumont, twelve miles or more within the German lines, the patrol met and fought with a squadron of eighteen or twenty German Fokkers. Only three of the American planes returned. I am told that these were riddled with bullets from the gun fire. Three of the German planes are known to have been brought down. No trace of Howard or his plane has ever been found. It is believed that it was exploded in the air. The 22nd Squadron has a record of forty-six German planes in a little more than two months. Of the original eighteen pilots, eleven were lost.

Records of the Class

"My daughter Emily spent much time in work connected with the war. She received instruction and was in attendance at the Massachusetts General Hospital, City Hospital, and the Peter Bent Brigham Hospital. From April to December, 1918, she served with the Red Cross and the Food Administration at Washington."

Died	August 29, 1916, Denver, Colo.

The following notice appeared in the Harvard Graduates' Magazine, December, 1916: "Frank Haven Clark died in Denver, Colorado, on August 29, 1916. While in college he played half-back on the Freshman football team, of which he was secretary and treasurer. During Sophomore and Junior years he played half-back on the University football team and in the Senior year was treasurer and manager of that organization. After leaving college he entered the Harvard Medical School, from which he graduated in 1888. After studying abroad for two years he went to Detroit, Michigan, where he lived for several years. In 1895 he went to Japan, where, with the exception of some travelling, he lived until 1899, when he returned to Detroit, which was his principal place of residence from that time until his death. He passed many summers in Cataumet, Mass. He had been in delicate health for a great many years and devoted most of his time to travelling, having visited almost every part of the world, including many remote regions rarely visited by travellers."

Degrees	A.B.
Married	April 15, 1886, Myra Louise Sawyer, Bangor, Maine.
Children	Myra Louise, April 26, 1887; Charles Eugene, Jr., born and died March, 1899.
Occupation	Journalist.
Address	156 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y.

He writes: "I have but little to add to my last report. I am still the editor of School, the organ of the Department of Education of New York City and am advocating the new education which is to teach the children how to use their brains, acquire useful and cultural knowledge, and how to earn their living. There is no other mystery about it as far as I can learn.

"At present I am active in exposing Bolshevism in the city and started a movement which led to the dismissal of several 'undesirable citizens' from the system. I advocated the entrance of the United States into the war with Germany after the sinking of the Lusitania, and when I could not get a commission abroad, I tried to acquire a military record in the United States. I published an editorial in School August 13, 1914, predicting that the United States would be drawn into the war. That brought two German spies into my office, but nothing desperate happened. They did not even try to bribe me. The only excitement I had during the whole war was when I trailed after two spies around the city for two days but could not find them. I had a lot of fun and made the acquaintance of police officers and detectives and that closes my record of belligerency.

"I also worked hard for Hughes' election and the mention of that closes my political career. Occasionally I have been drawn out of my sphere, as, for example, I made several visits to Sing Sing, when Tom Osborne was warden, and wrote some articles on his work. It was temporarily bedeviled by some cheap politicians, and they now repose 'where the woodbine twineth' without a 'requiescat in pace' on their tombstones. Like John Brown's soul, Tom's work goes on.

"In my private work, like everybody else, I am writing a play, and a manager has my opera under consideration. I have made a few minor discoveries in the psychology of music. I have planned a textbook for the teacher, but that is looking too far into the future."

planting about hospital, raising money for this through friends, as the Red Cross and Government decided not to do anything that year. In July, 1918, was offered command of a base hospital, but preferred to go to Air Service as member of the Board in charge of the Medical Research Laboratory at Mineola, L. I., as there was some chance that I might go overseas while there was no chance of this as C. O. of the hospital.

"Work at Mineola consisted of general oversight of the Ophthalmological work at the Laboratory and its twenty branches, of instruction and training of officers for work in the care of fliers, and of research work in Ophthalmology with special reference to the effect of flying conditions on the eyes. Much of the time I was Acting C. O. of the Laboratory. January 4, 1919, discharged from the Service.

"February 7, 1919, again joined the Medical Service, this time as Contract Surgeon, assigned for duty as consulting Ophthalmic Surgeon at Reconstruction Hospital No. X, Boston, a part time job. Continue private practice, with office at 522 Commonwealth Avenue, Boston."

*ROBERT SHAW MINTURN

Married	January 22, 1906, Bertha Howard Potter of New York, N. Y.
Died	March 15, 1918, New York, N. Y.

The following sketch by John Jay Chapman was published in the Harvard Graduates' Magazine, June, 1918:

"If you trace the history of Europe upward as far as the Crusades, you will find that there has always existed a race of courtly gentlemen whose dress, manners, and temperament fitted them as the plumage fits a fine bird. They wore swords, long or short, according to the dangers to which life exposed them, and coats of mail or of satin as the changing epochs decreed. But wherever they walked they bore their own inner gayety, and made a street seem fashionable by passing down it. Mercutio is the symbol of this perennial type of humanity; and whatever the socialists may say, and however the Labor

★ ROBERT SHAW MINTURN, 1918

Party in the House of Commons may vote, we all know that this kind of man can never be long absent from the life of the world. Nature will produce him again. The earth may lie fallow and hide the germ for a winter, but he is sure to reappear when the spring comes. The creature is the hardy product of nature's oldest humanities, and he has so deep a vitality that the mushroom growths of commerce and industrialism with all their pretense and all their propaganda, do no more than prepare the soil for his reappearance. Barbarisms subside, burgherdoms become refined, and the courtly gentleman rises and blooms once more.

"His habitat is a castle terrace, a drawing-room, a club; his atmosphere is social life. Social life excites him, the dinner table is his forum and arena. His powers are stimulated by banners and chandeliers, by prancing coursers and evening dress, by pictures, engravings, and the entourage of civilization. If he happens to be a public-spirited and religious person, all this appanage of luxury acts as a foil to his sterling qualities, and strange as it may sound, the setting appears to dignify and exalt his moral qualities. This illusion is one of the pleasing illusions of life. There is no use in trying to minimize or to explain it away: the thing is a part of nature.

"Although I knew Robert Minturn since the days of our infancy, and I was in the same form with him at St. Paul's School and in the same class with him at Harvard, I always think of him as he appeared at about the age of fifty, with chiseled features, iron gray hair, blue eyes, and the bearing wit, and dignity of an ecclesiastic in the age of Louis XIV. What a figure for New York to have produced! He was not only old New York, — which by the way was a stuffy enough place, and could show few figures like to him, — but he was the link between old New York and every variety of new New York; and he brought the gallantry of natural manners into many an icy palace, where coldness and rudeness had been adopted as the nearest American equivalents to the stiff English manners, — the manner that seemed to be required by the presence of flunkies and carpets unrolled across the sidewalk. New York is to-day humanized, but some years ago we had a bad epoch, in which every chair was a sentinel, and every social meeting was a morbid function—that is to say among the rich. Bob Minturn could not be frozen by furniture or by flummery. He was always genial, at home, full of information, radiant, unconscious.

“Minturn was ever a person of literary avocations, a student of style and of usage; and as a college boy he used to write essays and verses. There was one particular kind of writing in which he excelled in later life. He had a remarkable gift for friendship and a minute memory of the romantic past. Thus he was able to write for our class gatherings papers which he read aloud, and which reduced every one in the room to tears. This was partly due to his elocution which was truly remarkable. I used to get him to read pieces of my own aloud, because he could put more significance into them than I could myself; and he could read them at sight, no matter how illegible the condition of the manuscript might be. He had the old cultivation, the old literary passion, the old training. His favorite bits of prose and verse lived for him with a perennial life, and he could rehearse and recite them, as people used to do in 1850.

“At what period he first discovered in himself a talent for picture-buying I do not know; but that he had a rare and natural gift in this direction is indubitable. He acquired beautiful old pictures by finding them at odd times and in odd places, and every one of them was a thing you would give your eyes to own; and taken together they made his small house into a rich palace. It wasn't the collection of a dilettante, it was the soul's product of a true amateur. The pictures all struck the same note and poured it on you from the walls, tables, shelves, and mantels. One cannot explain a passion of this kind. Some people's objects are precious, but stand apart; other people's things make a unity and sing together. And Minturn's things, though all of them were secondary from the great collector's point of view, and some were mere scraps and fragments, seemed to glow with the sunlight of Italy and the Netherlands.

“Minturn was, moreover, a business man, and during a good many years, a long while ago, he had complete charge of ever so much family property. His training for this sort of work began as a clerk in the office of Morgan Drexel, and his experience of practical matters led to his becoming the treasurer and manager of charities and hospitals. Thus, for all his courtly conduct in the drawing-rooms, Minturn was a man of affairs and of public interests, and in his own way a pillar, and a very ornamental pillar, of society.

"It is strange to cast a rapid glance backward over his whole life and notice that every stage of his growth came about through some seeming calamity. His mind and character appeared to rise under stroke after stroke of the divine lightning. His looks betrayed it; for he grew steadily more handsome and more solid as he grew older, and as the inner beauty which was hid in the block shone forth. Beauty was a family inheritance, and he came by the frame of it naturally enough; but the spark was his own.

"As a child he was an elfin little creature, sprightly, clever, and whimsical; as a school-boy he was a gamin; as a college boy he was particularly foolish, carried away with the freedoms and excitements of under-graduate life, gadding and running wild in starry waistcoats and ridiculous apparel. It was always a joy to meet him in the College Yard; for he came with a flood of gossip, and was as witty as a Shakespearean clown. The Harvard social life was particularly degraded in those days. It was made up of petty rivalries, personal talk, and club ambitions. Minturn was my mentor in regard to these mysteries. I sat stupefied and listened to the fantastic tale, while Minturn seemed to be a kind of Puck who appeared on top of a hedgerow and gave news of the fairy underworld from which he had emerged, and into which he dived again.

"The first benevolent catastrophe which fate provided for him (for I shall not rehearse his griefs) was his sudden transfer from college to New York and to the deadly grind of business, law work, and the earning of a living. This and the tragic illness of his father were rolled upon him like stones upon a butterfly; but they flattened him only for a time. The new responsibilities entered into him, found the brain which was prepared for them, and revived him. I have known plenty of boys who passed through the same sort of experience and who came out of it gloomy and oppressed. But Bob was still himself.

"The secret of this power to expand lay in a depth of religious feeling which had always been within his nature, but lay like a well that was hidden. I scarcely know how it is, but the shattering events of life seem designed to attack a man's whole system merely for the purpose of forcing a single inner golden thread of resignation to vibrate. When this happens the tiny harmony reconstructs and informs the entire man. As for Bob, the more fate pressed him the stronger he grew.

"Thus a few years later, in early middle life, when he received the worst cut known to humanity in the shape of creeping paralysis, he blossomed under it. His walk in lameness took on a new dignity, his cane gave him weight; and that serenity of his which we all remember came to crown the slow dissolution of his body and the steady triumph of his spirit. I cannot give the precise chronology in his periods of reverse and good fortune, and they are of small importance; for the outcome of every life sheds its meaning on all that went before, and in Bob's case the outcome was so clear and continued for so long that what went before was forgotten.

"His old-fashioned bonhomie and a certain romanticism of manner never left him. When he met you, it was a meeting, and must be gay and genial. At the risk of violating convention I must tell of his behavior on the day of his last seizure, when he suddenly lost, for the time being, the power of articulation, and his final illness began. He was lunching at our house, and gave such an example of grand manners that his picture ought to be in the history of knighthood forever. We were in the sitting-room and he arrived late and began to apologize. When he found that he had not the word, he tried again,—vainly. He was confused, smiling, baffled,—distressed that he should be the cause of concern to others. There was nothing tragic about him, except the fact of his trouble. It was the last stand of the old courtier.

Records of the Class

"The great war had broken out at a time when Minturn was failing; and the passionate interest he took in the war no doubt hastened his end. He was among those to whom the slowness of America's response to the general peril was a source of grief, shame, inexpressible solicitude. His emotions were excited to the highest pitch, and all the heroic feeling which had sustained him against the trials of his own life was called upon in the cause of humanity. He could not respond: he could only break. A good many people have been killed by the war besides those who die at the front.

"For more than a year he lay dying, his mind being successively obscured and cleared by the clouds that drifted over him and the gleams of sun that reached him from the outer world. In such manner was he gradually engulfed, and the chasm closed over him. One is tempted to pause, and say, 'If I had been the Creator I should have omitted this last scene, or else I should have had the facts merely told by a messenger to the audience and not acted out upon the stage.' But we are not the Creator, and must accept the mysteries of life as they are given us."

Married	June 26, 1884, Nellie Munro Fessenden, Arlington, Mass.
Children	Nathaniel Cushing, Jr., June 19, 1885; Edward Fessenden, March 14, 1892 (died August 19, 1894).
Died	October 10, 1915, Boston, Mass.

The following notice appeared in the Harvard Graduates' Magazine, December, 1915: "Nathaniel Cushing Nash died in Boston on October 10, 1915, after an illness of many months. After graduating with the Class he was a special student at Harvard during the academic term of 1885-1886, taking a course in history and political economy. During the years 1891 and 1892 he took a course of study in botany in the Graduate School, receiving the degree of A.M. at Commencement in 1892. After that he devoted himself principally to the care of his own property, engaging also in a variety of outside interests. He always felt a keen interest in the Botanic Garden, and for many years served on the committee appointed by the Overseers to visit that institution. He served also on the Committee on Botany, acting for several years as its Chairman. He gave to the University the botanical lecture room, which was named in memory of his father, N. C. Nash. His recreations were yachting, fishing, shooting and hunting big game. He was an expert rifle shot and gave much attention to the sport, being a director and president of the Massachusetts Rifle Association. He was a director of the Cambridge Trust Company from the time it was founded and for several years held the position of president of the Company. He had been a director at different times in a number of other corporations and was a member of many clubs, patriotic associations and societies. His son Nathaniel graduated at Harvard with the degree of A.B. in 1907, and from the Harvard Law School in 1911 with the degree of LL.B. He is now practicing his profession in Boston."

California, on August 14, 1915, as the result of acute dilatation of the heart. After graduating from college, as the holder of the John Thornton Kirkland Travelling Fellowship, he took up research work in chemistry in the laboratory of Professor Von Baeyer in Munich. He returned to America in 1887 and became professor of chemistry at Purdue University, where he accomplished notable work. From 1889 to 1892 he did research work in organic chemistry at Clark University, Worcester, Mass. In 1892 he went to the University of Chicago, where he remained until the time of his death. Nef's work was widely known in Europe as well as in this country. He has published the results of his research work in the American Chemical Journal and in other journals. He was a member of the National Academy of Sciences, the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, and the Royal Society of Science, Upsala, Sweden. An interesting sketch of Nef's life and of his work by Julius Stieglitz, Professor and Chairman of the Department of Chemistry in the University of Chicago, was published in the University Record for October, 1915."

It is a mere accident when any one of us gets a glimpse into the inner life of another. Our ideas about human character come to us for the most part out of poetry and fiction, while our living friends walk about cloaked in a mysterious reticence which we respect; and indeed we have not the time to guess what may lie behind it. If we do so, our guesses themselves become a sort of poetry; and I suppose that this is the way in which the romancers feed their dreams. It would seem that our imagination, though it controls our nature, yet lies aloof and broods over us from its nest. There are, however, shocks that bring fact and fiction together; and the greatest of them is sudden death.

Little Snow White lay in a coffin covered with glass, and the dwarfs watched by her side for six months; for the dwarfs suspected she was not dead. Moreover, the dwarfs, being fairy people, took everything lightly and hoped for the best. The fable is charming, and yet, like the rest of German folklore, it is injured by an unpoetic, brutal use of the gruesome; it sports in an unhuman way about a great human mystery. There is indeed a plate of glass which instantly and invisibly descends between us and the dead, and shows them to us in a peculiar twilight of their own—in a place which seems to have been in existence before they died. No effort of the imagination can set a living friend within that glamorous half-light into which a companion steps the moment we hear that he is dead.

The Greeks and Romans with their Hades and its gloomy rivers, sad landscape, strange beasts, shadowy judges, and “the strengthless heads of the dead” have left a dreadful account of the ghastly side of this under-world; but the classics seem never to have made a fable about the bright side of the experience, or given his due to Death the Illuminator. For Death dramatizes the past as nothing else can do. Our friends, in stepping into shadow, give us back whole histories, and lift a veil from forgotten scenes which seem to be magically staged for our review. They themselves take the center of the scene in a way they never did in real life, and we know them, as it were, for the first time.

The Great War is memorable and unique in this, that it has left our civilian heroes surrounded by the same glory that used to be reserved for the soldier. The moral issues of the war are the reason for this merger. Those issues burned as fiercely and consumed as much in the lives of civilians as of warriors. The sacrifices were made without the thought that there was sacrifice, and almost every one took part in them. Sculptors, physicians, lawyers, apothecaries, retired business men, unreformed voluptuaries, unknown sewing-women passed through an internal French Revolution, a quickly passing, ephemeral judgment-day that set all men and classes on the same level, and constituted a little age by itself. We are still winking our eyes at the light, as we issue from the cavern of this joint experience, and I set down these notes about a classmate, knowing that they illustrate the doings of hundreds of thousands of people most of whom are alive. The strange thing is that if Plummer had not been killed I should never have seen him in his penumbra, which must, nevertheless, be shining about the survivors also; for death creates nothing, but reveals.

If a prophetess had predicted on the day of our graduation thirty-five years ago that a member of the class of '84 would be buried in rural France; that his funeral would be attended by a file of soldiers with a French Colonel at its head; that an entire village would turn out for the occasion; that the hero would be laid in ground given by the village and to be kept in order forever at the expense of the municipality, — no one of us would have guessed that Tom Plummer was the man; and Plummer himself would have greeted such an idea with the quizzical humor he always displayed when his own affairs were mentioned. He was completely unaware, even more than the rest of us, that he was a man with a big brain, and a destiny. I can hardly realize it yet; though I always knew he had a big character.

At the time he came to Harvard he knew more of the real world than Harvard Freshmen usually do; though his outward appearance of cherubic innocence did not betray this. He had read French and German and had lived in foreign places and seen something of the older civilizations. He had done these things quietly and casually, not as a tourist. His mother was a wonderfully gentle, witty, cultivated, loving woman who wore beautiful old-fashioned rings, and was surrounded by little well-bound volumes of the poets and quaint charming objects of all sorts. She was exceedingly gracious and humorous, indeed she was very much like Tom; and it was by her that he had been dipped in the great world, I mean into that stream of traditional social life, where ideals, romances, poetry, music, and conversation are mingled, — a stream which does not much change in character from age to age. Mrs. Plummer and Tom were very much like those gentlefolk who live in Bologna and Venice and inherit some quiet old family palace, as well as the amenities that go with the palace and have been going on uninterruptedly since the days of ancient Rome. They were people without pretension, without ambition, without self-consciousness — adorable people.

Thus when Tom came to college he was n't really half so frightened by college as the rest of us were. His shy, odd, humorous detachment concealed a certain amount of worldly equipment. We, of course, could not perceive this, because Tom was an undersized elf with small hands and feet, weak shoulders, a large square head, and eyes that rolled open suddenly when he threw his head back and stared as if to catch a thought. He was always laughing, and he laughed at ideas that were subtle. The interests, the amusements, the temptations of the average American college boy are crude. In fact they are so silly that almost any boy can be protected against them, if he be given some slight experience of Europe before he is sent to college. In like manner Ulysses was protected from the enchantments of Circe by smelling from time to time the flowers which Hermes had put in his hands before the interview. Tom, as I say, possessed this antidote to college — a whiff of Europe.

He floated through the maelstrom of Harvard like a Kobalt on a leaf. His mental maturity protected him among other dangers in college, from that of social success; he didn't make clubs and societies. His indolence and lack of ambition prevented him from learning anything in particular in the bookish way, and athletics were out of the question, for he could hardly use his hands to eat with, — he was so clumsy; and, of course, he hated athletics. He used to read — or read in — miscellaneous literature, and take dilettante courses about the fine-arts. I tutored him in Homer. Our method was simple. Plummer had a good verbal memory, and, of course, one could make a fair guess at the passages which were likely to be given for translation on the examination paper. Plummer memorized the standard English translation of a selected lot of Homeric beauties. He studied also the introductory key-words to each passage; for, of course, if he should get started on the wrong passage, nothing could save him. The method would be exposed, and Plummer disgraced. But as a matter of fact, he got through.

After college we lost Plummer for years, and we used to hear of him as a traveler in Morocco, in the Holy Land, at Bayreuth, etc. He became a whimsical, aimless globe-trotter and roller-up of reminiscences. When he drifted in from time to time, his gayety was tinged with a melancholy which deepened with the years. His jokes flitted like butterflies across a churchyard. But in the eighties and nineties we did not notice such things. We next heard that he was settling down and taking life seriously on a farm near his native town. He was supposed to be hard up and conscientious, rather a recluse, but mysteriously and importantly raising chickens.

There is one quality which betrays itself immediately in any one's conversation, namely, renunciation. It betrays itself by revealing a point of view; and Tom, even in his boyhood, was always playfully taking a back seat. He did the same in later life. When his chickens would not lay, but died (as of course they did), he buried their corpses with an epigram; and I have no doubt that he had buried many a secret desire by Moslem tombs in Syria, or dropped a casket of letters in the Rhone as he stood on the bridge at Avignon. This quality of renunciation is the basis of the fine characters of the world. It makes for intellect, it makes for humor, it is the foundation of a sort of invisible power which one feels in many humble people and in many eminent people, and this power was hidden somewhere about Plummer, and when war broke out, the force in him blazed out suddenly into self-immolation, efficiency, and death.

The spring of 1914 found him a confirmed old bachelor who lived in his haunts and dim seclusions, like an old trout under a river-bank. If you plunged your hand in and seized him he would leap and flash with many colors; and then dive off again to the depths of his dreamy quietude at the bottom of the stream. The invasion of Belgium waked him with a bounce. He offered his services to our Government and was employed by the American Embassy in France, where his knowledge of French and German made him useful in censoring the letters of German prisoners of war during the period of our neutrality. After our entry into the war he enlisted in the Red Cross, and went to the front—the extreme front in a remote village on the eastern border of France near Saint-Dié. Here he organized a canteen, and by ten months of excessive labor, both mental and manual, wore himself out. He lived just long enough, however, to hear the Armistice proclaimed, and to welcome the hordes of French, English, Italian, Russian, and Rumanian prisoners released from Germany, who swarmed across the trenches. On November 23 he was seized by pneumonia and died on the following day. The Croix de Guerre of France and a citation from the medical service of the Seventh Army arrived at the hospital on the day after his death.

The heroism of the young is part of the order of nature, and we accept it gladly. But when an elderly recluse of cultivated tastes plunges into the mêlée to save the world by a kind of labor for which his whole life would seem to have unfitted him, the act wears a beauty of its own which casts the young heroes for one moment into the shade.

I add one of Tom's latest letters in which he describes the morning of the Armistice; for it is a piece of great writing:

AMERICAN Y.M.C.A.

November 13, 1918.

On active service with the American Expeditionary Force, Cantine Franco-Américaine, No. 31. Same place—Moyennmoutier—at what was a few days ago the front! (I don't know where it is to-day!)

Since last Sunday I have been meaning to set down, as I felt them, the extraordinary sensations of these last few days. When I have had the moments to do this I have been too tired to do it well, and so have not done it at all. Just as well I suppose—every little scribbler in Europe has thought he could express on paper what every one, stupid, intelligent, or just plain absorbent, has been feeling these last few days of the war. You have escaped me and so be thankful.

Monday morning, though, sticks tightest to my fading memory. I went to build the canteen fire at about 5.15 A.M. The poilus, we are all friends here now, began to stand around and wait for the water to boil and me to make chocolate. The air seemed vibrating with expected news. We are mostly a Breton regiment here and not emotional. Soon a poilu in a helmet joined the group. He knew, — they knew it at Saint-Dié. It was official — it had been posted up at Etival. Another poilu joined the group. The telephone message had been taken that morning at the military telephone bureau where he worked. There was absolutely no doubt about it. At 11 o'clock the Armistice signed was to go into effect! Still almost no emotion shown by the poilus. Quiet talk and expression of wonderment that, after four years of the trenches and wounds and privations and death of comrades, it could all end at last. Two American soldiers dropped in from somewhere. One of them, turning to me, said: "What an unemotional nation the French is." I tried to explain a little and failed utterly. I was like a charged wire. All of us were like that, though no one expressed it by his face or gesture. Then a poilu helped me carry the heavy twenty-five liter "marmite" of chocolate into the canteen and I began to serve through the slide to the men. One stolid, middle-aged Breton (we are of the Territorials here now) sat down on a little wooden bench and staring straight in front of him burst out with: "Bon sang — de bon sang — de bon sang!! et de penser à Verdun! Ah, la putain!" That was all he could say and it was his "cri du cœur." He had been at Verdun and he called her a "bitch" for whom he had been willing to give his life. Much in the same way Hamlet calls to his father's ghost, "Old true penny."

Still the quiet talk among the poilus went on. I joined in when spoken to, — no visible emotion, but intense consciousness that emotion unexpressed was in each soldier. Many stated that it is to America that France owes the end.

Soon the broad road filled with soldiers in groups and strolling. The bells were to be rung at eleven. They had n't rung since the day Italy entered the war. There had been some suspicion of signals made to the Germans from the belfry.

The morning wore on very calmly, — a lovely autumn morning. It began to be near eleven and an occasional pre-monitory "dong" fell from the belfry of the big old church. They had been oiling the iron work from which the bells hung. We could see the men, very small, away up there, through the slats of the broken blinds of the belfry. They were the ringers. It was one of the most intense moments I have ever lived through. And then they rang out solemnly, joyously, and the soldiery and the village folk gathered below in the wide street, began to laugh and to talk and put hands affectionately on blue-clad shoulders. Full realization had come to them that war was ended and peace almost here.

Following is the citation which accompanied the Croix de Guerre conferred upon Plummer:

"Plummer, Thomas, in charge of mobile canteen, No. 31. American citizen, free from military obligation, owing to his age, always near the line, in a sector where climatic conditions are particularly rigorous, created and organized several comforting posts on the most advanced spots of the sector, thus making always available for the troops in line the benefit of his valuable canteen."

The following notice appeared in the Harvard Graduates' Magazine, June, 1918: "Roger Faxton Sturgis died in Boston, Mass., on February 26, 1918. After graduating at Harvard with the Class he studied law for two years at the Harvard Law School. In July, 1886, he entered the law offices of Brooks and Nichols in Boston and was admitted to the Suffolk County (Boston) Bar in February, 1887. He remained in the office of Henry G. Nichols, '77, the surviving partner of Brooks and Nichols, until 1890, when he began practice on his own account. In July, 1893, he became a member of the firm of Storey and Thorndike, with whom he remained until July, 1898, when he withdrew to enter again practice by himself, in which he continued until the time of his death. His practice for the most part consisted in acting as trustee and in the management of estates for his clients, but he had also acted as general counsel for a number of corporations and from time to time had conducted important cases in the courts. He was a delegate, appointed by the Governor to represent Massachusetts at the First National Tax Conference in 1907. An article of his, entitled 'Taxation—A Problem,' was published in pamphlet form by the Boston News Bureau. He had given long and careful study to matters of taxation, with special reference to taxation under the laws of Massachusetts, and had published articles on this and on constitutional questions. He had compiled also a very complete genealogical history of his branch of the Sturgis family, entitled 'Edward Sturgis and His Descendants,' which he published for private distribution."

THIRTIETH ANNIVERSARY

The thirtieth anniversary of graduation was celebrated in 1914, on June 16 and 17. The headquarters of the Class was a suite of rooms at the Hotel Puritan, where most of the members attending registered. On Tuesday, June 16, about fifty men gathered at the Belmont Country Club in Belmont, where luncheon was served. In the afternoon a number of men attended the Class Day exercises in the Stadium. On Wednesday, June 17, about fifty members sat together at the Harvard-Yale baseball game. The Class dinner occurred in the evening at the Harvard Club, at which eighty-nine members were present. Gordon Abbott presided and R. S. Minturn acted as toastmaster. After dinner formal speeches were made by Agassiz, Aiken, C. T. Billings, Conant, Drown, Hardwick, Jewett, Mullen, Sexton and Terrell. Chapman being absent in Europe, a poem written by him for the Class was read by Minturn.

CLASS DINNER

On the thirty-second anniversary of graduation the Class met at dinner at the Algonquin Club, on Wednesday evening, June 21, 1916. Dr. F. C. Cobb acted as toastmaster, and speeches were made by Baylies, C. T. Davis, Drown, Hunting, Osborne and Sexton. Hunting related his experiences as a member of the first Harvard Unit in hospital work in France, and Osborne described the work of reform accomplished by him at Sing Sing Prison.
